Racing Racing Racing Racing Incorporating sustainability into its corporate strategy can raise many questions: How do you measure sustainability? How do you function in sustainability for your business? How do you define sustainability for your corporation? Triple Bottom Line is one of the main systems used by companies to assess the profits they earn through their corporate sustainability solutions. The Triple Bottom Line method asks you to see beyond the traditional bottom of the business to the profits that make your business socially, environmentally and economically. Measuring your business using Triple Bottom Line is one of the best indicators of how sustainable your business is and how profitable it really is. Social Sustainability The social bottom line measures the profits of your business in human capital, including your position within your local society. Your social conclusion is enhanced by fair and useful working practices and the involvement of the corporate community, and can also be measured in the impact of your business activities on the local economy. For example, some of the questions you can ask yourself when measuring corporate social responsibility are: Is your company driving job growth in your city? Are you or your employees returning to the community? Are the people you employ statistically better placed within the community in terms of economic and community health? Does your business support local initiatives and is the overall sustainability of your community/region growing? Do you enforce fair employment standards? What is the demographics of your employees? After all, if your company doesn't nurture positive relationships with your community, your customer base and employee pool are decreasing accordingly. The social bottom line challenges the belief that the less a company pays for its workforce, the longer it can afford to do business. Instead, the social bottom line measures the long-term sustainability of business human capital, with the understanding that a job that is also a desirable workplace will always be able to operate in the future, as there will be a workforce that seeks to be part of the business. Basically, corporate and labor interests are considered interdependent. Like most subjective public relations efforts or intangible benefits, your social bottom line can be difficult to measure. However, the Global Reporting Initiative (GRI) has developed guidelines that allow companies to report and measure their social impact. Environmental sustainability The triple bottom line approach to sustainability takes the view that the less impact your business has on the environment and the less natural resources you consume, the longer and more successful your business will be. Controlling the bottom of the environment means managing, monitoring and reporting on consumption and waste and emissions. This is usually the work of your EHS department, although most business models also make waste reduction and green policies corporate values at all levels of governance. The Sustainability Committee is often needed to communicate your sustainability solution and sustainability goals across departments. Measuring and reporting your bottom line of the environment is certainly possible, although depending on the size of your business, it can be a lengthy and difficult process. However, EHS or corporate sustainability software can make the process much faster and more cost-effective. Again, the Global Reporting Initiative offers several useful metrics for measuring and reporting on your triple bottom of the environment. These include (but are not limited to): Renewable energy use and energy consumption (direct and indirect) The amount of material recycled The amount of water withdrawn from local Water Sources Total NOx, SOx and GHG Emissions Economic Viability In the Triple Bottom Line approach, economic sustainability is not just your traditional corporate capital. Your economic capital according to the Triple Bottom Line model needs to be measured in terms of how much impact your business has on its economic environment. A business that strengthens the economy in which it is part is one that will continue to thrive in the future, as it contributes to the overall economic health of its support networks and community. Of course, the company must also be aware of its traditional profits, and triple bottom line does so. Does your company help local suppliers stay in business and make a profit - no single bottom line can sustain a business on its own. Your business needs a healthy workforce with different skills, different perspectives, and the workforce needs to be satisfied enough to achieve growth. Your business can only operate in an economic situation where your supply chain and local businesses thrive. If your city or region economically becomes a dead zone, your own company will not have access to people or resources in the long run. Your good management of natural resources is needed to ensure that they are available 5- 10 years down the road and beyond. Unlike the traditional method, Triple Bottom Line allows you to see your business as a social and environmental entity and measure it by those parameters.
